WHY DO YOU GET THE MUNCHIES?

Most are familiar with the concept of getting the munchies after consuming marijuana. Still, most don't know why it happens. A few scientific reasons can explain why people feel an increase in appetite after consuming cannabis.

THC heightens the senses The cliché often used about cannabis that "it just makes everything better" is actually backed up with science! In a 2014 study, neuroscientists discovered that THC stimulated the brain's olfactory bulb in mice – the part of the brain responsible for recognizing odours – causing the mice to eat more than usual. There's also data that suggests THC stimulates receptors in the hypothalamus and produces the hormone "ghrelin", which is responsible for regulating hunger.

Marijuana reduces inhibitions The main attraction of the "high" from THC is the release of dopamine in the brain. A drawback is that it can lower one's inhibitions. Decreased inhibitions are typically associated with social settings and interactions, but they also significantly impact cravings. Lowering inhibitions means eating more foods that perhaps we wouldn't have eaten otherwise.

So next time the "munchies" kick in for you or a friend, you'll know why it's happening, even if it can't get rid of it just then.

FUN FACTS

DOOMSDAY VAULT

One of the coolest cannabis fun facts is the existence of the "Doomsday Vault." It is a secret vault housing thousands of cannabis seeds and other plant species. The vault's location is on the island of Svalbard, between the North Pole and Norway.

Interestingly, the vault received one of its largest seed deposits in 2020. It welcomed over 60,000 seed samples from 36 different groups and countries.

SHAKESPEARE SMOKED

Maybe his source of inspiration? Marijuana residues were found in William Shakespeare's home, which we believe could have been an enormous aid in writing all the screenplays and poems.
